THE NEW TURKISH CONSTITUTION. "The provisional Presidency of the Chamber of Deputies for this year is confided to Alimed. Vefik Effendi, whose uprightness of character, avalty, and consoity for directing parliamentary debates are universally recognised." So ran the Imperial Hatt. I well remembered bow elearly his character had been illustrated one day at Bronssa, what time he held a commission from the Porte to put that particularly untidy place into order. "Move your housen a little backward out of the street," said he one day to a genfleman whose domicile interrupted the coup d'dit of A hmed Venk's favourite thoroughfare. "I shall do no such thing." was the reply. " What reasons have you for ordering me to pull down my dwelling !" " Two," said the Commissioner: you will improve the street, and you will crease the value of your property. Pull it down in three months, or I will do it for you, and Th three months elapsol, and still the house stood when one morning Ahmed Velik rode up with lot of workmen, and in about an bour had improved the street and the gentlemen's propert too: Remember him? The Lord Chamberlian has refused to grant a licence for the theatre at Sadlers' Wells until stone stairs have been erected for all portions of the building; and his lordship is understood to have stated that he is determined in future to grant no licence for any theatre in which wooden stairs are used, and that he will insist on all stairs being removed and replaced, with stone. In Sadlers' Wells the requisitions of the Lord Chamberlian are being carried out. A London paper says: - We recently expressed our regret that the subject of "Le Père," the new, drama at the Gy munse Theatre. Paris, was of such a thicklish nature that we could not place any statement of the plat before our renders. A new Paris paper, L' Echo de la Presse Elrangera, makes the following laconic, but expressive, comments upon the play in question: -"Gymnase-Le Père-Ah! On! Eub! Pesss Qhut Penh!" Here's a model for verbose critical We learn from the Halifax Guardian that Mr. Gardner Coyne, the comedian, while representing Conn in the "Staughraun" lately at the Wishaw Theatrs, got his face severely injured in consequence of being shot at at too ebort a distance. The wadding struck him a little below the eye on the right side of the face, and two hours after the occurrence the would was still bleeding. Few, if any, of the andience noticed the accident. Fortunately his eyesight is not injured.

Mr. Fornivall's introduction to the " Leopole

Shakespeare," which he is editing for Mesere. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin, deals with the plays and poems in obronological order. The writer endeavours to bring a fresh element of certainty into that order, by noting the links of subject, incident, character, tone, and phrase between the plays coming next to one another, so as to provethat Shakespeare's worksare, as it were, one continuous series from "Love's Labour's Lost" to " Henry the Eighth." And as the plays and poems are arranged in four divisions, so Mr. Edraivall contends that the works of each division fall into smaller groups of plays speci ally linked together. Thus, in the first group of the first period, "Love's Labour's Lost," "The Errors," and "The Dream " are connected; by the comedy shall of them turning upon mistaken identity. The later group of "Romeo! and Juliet," the "Venus" and "Lucrece," by the passion and richness of fancy in all; thefire group of the third period, "Julius Camr," Hamlet," "Measure for Measure," by the unfitness of their hero's nature to bear the burden laid on it, &c. The sounds are briefly unalysed and held to be autobigraphic and interpretative of the playe, -Athenœum. Such machinery as was put in motion some two years ago by the friends of Herr Wagner, in order to collect funds for the Baymuth Festival, is now, it appears, to be employed with a view to a Beethoven memorial; and a series of Bestboven concerts in all the great capitals where Beethoven's music is known ought to bring in enough money to enable the memorial committee to erect the finest monument that has ever been raised to the memory of a composer. The world bas not hitherto been in the habit of paying the highest honours to the orgators of musical works. We applaud them and summon them before the stage our tain on great occasions, when they happen to be in our presence or well within reach; and long after their death we continue, in the case of really great masters to listen to their music. The Grapic writes as follow on Heir Wagner's claim on the State :- Herr Richard Wagner has ertainly one characteristic of a great man-he is not easily durated. No one believed that his festival last autumn would succeed; yet it was one of the most magnificent successes of recent times. Now, it appears, bu desires touchters, if not a more brilliant triumph, at least one more in accordance with his own ideas. To Englishmen the letter part of the proposal access very like a joke, but liere Wagner is not given to jokes, and urges his the music of the future is distinctly actional, it claims also to give voice to the deepest intellegtual life of Europe. -If, then, it is right that the German Government should contribute to the emprort of its professors, we do not see why other governments should not be asked to tothe same. It would be an edifying speciacle to see M. Gambetta, for instance, urging, M. Jules Simon for the sake of cosmopolitan culture, to encourage German genius. * A SOCIAL AMUSEMENT.

When I was a dancing man-let us say in the year when Planeus was Consul, and Mrs. Bouncer first began: to let her room to Messrs. Box and Cox-an Indian Prince, taken to the Toxophilite Bill in the Regent's Park, requested the officer in attendance on him by order of John Company (who was alive then, and living in Loadenball Street) to send away those people-indicating the ladies and centlemen who were dancing-because he (that Prince) had seen enough of them. The idea which one of the brightest entertain-. ments of that day (and for all I know of this) gave him was that the company had been hired to waltz and gallopade for his amusement. That was what he thought of a ball. He could not see in the countenances or demeanour of those fair women and brave men who were circling to the strains of the "Valsed'Amour" or plunging to the rhythm of the "Sturm March" any indication that what they did was for their own amusement And yet in those times it was not "good form" to look sulky. If at the next ball you attend you can manage to abstract your mind from preconceived ideas, and ludge only by what you see (as did the Indian Prince), you must conclude that one portion of the dancers are explating some of their sins, or preparing for some sorrowful news by taking painfu exercise under the influence of sweet music and that another portion is taking revenge upon its fellow-guests for injuries previously sustained. The young gentlemen assembled in the doorways, feeling the bows of their ties and the buttons of their gloves, and the weariness and regret to the solemnity of the scene. If an eve be bright with innocent excitement, if a smile bubble up from a happy heart, if the music of girlhood's laugh arises and shames the masterpiece of Strauss just finished—be sure that an ebullition so out of "place must come from a novice who will soon know better. If society were called upon to explain bow it gets its amusement out of this sort of thing, it could no more answer than can you when I ask you how you draw your

THE SEA SERPENT The oldest accounts on record of the ap penrance of a great sea-creature resembling a serpent are those quoted by Bishop Pontoppidan in his description of the untural history of his native country. Morway. Amongs these, says Mr. R. A. Proctor in the Gentle man's Magazine, was one confirmed by oatl Thke before a magistrate by two of the cres of a shin commanded by Cantain de Ferry of the Norwegian Navv. The captain and eight men saw the animal, near Molde, is August, 1747. They described it as of the reneral form of a serpent, stretched on th ace in receding coils (meaning, probably the shape assumed by the neck of a swar when the head is drawn back). The bead which resembled that of a horse, was raised two feet above the water. In August, 1817 large marine animal, supposed to be a serrient, was seen near Cane Ann. Massachusetts. Eleven witnesses of good reputation gave evidence anouth before magistrates. Opeof these magistrates had himself seen the creature. and corroborated the most important points of the evidence given by the eleven witnesses: The creature had the appearance of a serpent dark brown in colour (some said mottled) with white under the bead and neck. It length was estimated at from 50 to 100 feet. The head was in shape like a sorpent's, but as large as a horse's. No mane was noticed. Five of the witnesses deposed to protuberances on the back; four said the back was straight; the other two gave no opinion on this point. The ungistrate who had seen the animal considered the appearance of protuberances was due to the bendings of the body while in rapid motion. In 1848, when the captain of the British frigate Dodalus had published an account of a similar animal. seen by him and several of his officers and crew the Hon. Colonel T. H. Perkins, of Boston, who had seen the animal on the occasion just mentioned in 1817, gave an account (conied from a letter written in 1820) of what he had witnessed. It is needless to quote those peints which correspond with what has been already stated. Colonel Perkins noticed "an appearance in the front of the head like single horn, about nine inches to a foot in length, shaped like a marlinspike, which will presently be explained I left the place," he proceeds. "fully satisfied that the reports in circulation, though differing in details, were essentially correct." He relates bow a person able inhabitants of the town, who had been monster that he had not given himself the purpose of housekeeping and cookery. of Sta longth, from 20 to 60 feet, above the surface of the water, and without any evident signs of undulation, either vertically or horizontally. Now, apart from all zoological ovidence, our knowledge of physical laws will not permit us to believe that the portion thus visible above the surface was propelled by the undulations of a portion concealed below the surface, unless this latter portion largely excreded the former in bulk. A true fish does not swim for any length of time with any but a very small portion of its body shove water; probably large cels never show even a head or fin above water for more than a few seconds. when not at rest. Cetaceans, owing to the avere of blubber which float them up, relmain often for a long time with a portion of their bulk out of the water, and the larger sort often swim long distances with the head and fore part out of water. But even then: the greater part of the creature's bulk is under water, and the driving appai ratus, the unterior fine and the mighty tail, are constantly under water (when the animal is urging its way horizonatally, be if understood). A sea-creature, in fact, whatever its nature, which keeps any considerable volume of its body out of water constantly, while travelling a long distance. must of necessity bave much greater volume all the time under water, and must have its propelling apparatus under water. Moreover, if the propulsion be not effected by fine, paddles, a great flat tail, or these combined, but by the undulations of the animal's own body, then the part out of water must of necessity by affected by these undulations. unless it be very small in volume and length compared with the part under water. Tassert both these points as matters depending on physical laws, and without fear that the best-informed zoologist can adduce any instances to the contrary. It is, in fact, physically impossible that such instances should exist. It would not be saving too much to
